

I always thought it was the American way to stay ahead of the competition. Rather it being a physical activity or providing a service or product. People have overlooked what is good for others and only concentrate on what is good for themselves. It's greed like this that hinders great minds like the people of XM radio that is still trying to provide the best for their listeners. I spend about 90% of the year on the road or traveling the abroad. The information with traffic and weather help me with some of my decision making on what direction I'm going to travel. Along with the great music provided it probably would be a good idea to add some information on certain airports and flight delays to make it a complete hat trick.

I feel sad that the the people of the NAB feel so threatened that they have to spend millions of dollars protesting the best thing going right now. I think they should take those millions of dollars and place an XM radio in each car of the people protesting XM and enjoy just like the intelligent that have XM radio now.

Sincerely XM listener,
David A. Mitchell
